Is a higher rate of JobSeeker a disincentive to work?

Our experience is that this is simply not true.

The vast majority of people want to work. A small cohort legitimately cannot seek or maintain employment but are ineligible for other payment types, while only a tiny group of people ‘play the system’.

It is wrong to design a punitive system for the majority based on the behaviour of a small minority. A low rate is actually acting as a barrier to work through hindering the ability of people to present themselves well or maintain readiness to work.

The Claim
A common objection to raising the rate of JobSeeker and associated payments is that an income support payment to cover the essentials is a disincentive to seeking work.

This was most recently raised by the Prime Minister who told the Sydney radio station 2GB (29 June 2020) that the government could not allow the JobSeeker unemployment benefit – effectively doubled for six months until September – “to become an impediment to people going out and doing work, getting extra shifts”. The Prime Minister cited “a lot of anecdotal feedback from small businesses, even large businesses, where some of them are finding it hard to get people to come and take the shifts because they’re on these higher levels of payment”.

Evidence
People are looking for work
Despite claims that people aren’t looking for work, the National Skills Commission reported that only 3% of 2,324 businesses surveyed said they were having – or expected to have – difficulty recruiting staff due to a lack of applicants. In addition, jobs portals Seek and Indeed both report a marked increase in job search and application activity. This is despite the mandatory requirements of mutual obligation, to apply for up to 20 jobs a month, being relaxed during COVID-19.

The jobs just aren’t there
For those who are actively looking for work, suitable jobs are in short supply. According to the ANZ measure of job ads, employment ads were down 42% (over 60,000) from February to July 2020. There are 12 Australians on unemployment payments for every 1 vacancy. This does not include those seeking work but not receiving payments which can push the figure up to 18 for every vacancy.
The jobs don’t fit the workforce

Innes Willox of the Australian Industry Group said that recent National Skills Commission data showed “a large share of the difficulty employers are having filling vacancies is due to a lack of suitable skills in the available workforce”. Government, education and training providers, employers and industry bodies all have a role to play in training people for work and matching jobseekers to jobs.

An essential income is not Easy Street

Recent research on the impacts of the recession on both young people and older workers (ANU, Brotherhood of St Laurence) suggest that even with a temporary raised rate of JobSeeker, many of these households are still experiencing housing stress. This temporary rate is allowing many families to meet only the minimum costs of housing, adequate amounts of healthy food and basic transport and medical needs.

“Attending an interview has a price tag even if you don’t get the job.”

The poverty line is well below the minimum wage

The current temporary rate of JobSeeker is keeping households just above the poverty line. Meaning there is little to none discretionary spending beyond the basics. The minimum wage is about 50% more than JobSeeker. The financial incentive to work is there.

“This enables me to be ready to seek employment knowing that at home everything is in order and I can go job hunting without that main stress factor, which is the stresses at home.”
- Melissa, JobSeeker

JobSeeker is different from JobKeeper

We have found some media commentary confusing the more generous and less targeted JobKeeper rate with Jobseeker. In particular, the flat rate of JobKeeper is going to all employees regardless of previously contracted hours. JobKeeper is temporary response to COVID-19 restrictions but JobSeeker needs to retained a s safety net for all, beyond the COVID-19 crisis.

A level of income support that allows people to access decent food and safe accommodation is not a disincentive to work. It is the opposite. With basic necessities covered, people are able to look for work, travel to interviews and maintain a positive and productive outlook.
